Samayantar's two-and-a-half-decade fight against the shrinking of Hindi's world.

Samayantar completed 26 years of existence. For its more than four thousand subscribers, each issue provides a record of an India that has changed almost beyond recognition. Several of its earlier contributors are no longer alive, while many new names have established themselves as journalists, writers and intellectuals.

If its focus during the initial years was on the impact of globalisation, liberalisation and privatisation, today its issues regularly discuss the assault on democracy, the rise of Hindutva politics, and the persistent question of caste.

"Samayantar is the only Hindi magazine for today that is alive to the present," Siddharth Ramu, an author and rights activist, told me. "The whole country has been on its map, which is very difficult for a Hindi magazine."

Samayantar's stall at Delhi's World Book Fair draws readers from across the country. The magazine's archive, including issues it no longer holds, has been kept by devoted readers.

Bisht was born in Bombay on 20 February 1946, while the city's ports heaved under a mutiny by Indian sailors in the colonial navy. His father worked in the province's welfare department; the family later moved to Panikhat

Despite lacking corporate backing, Samayantar's scope is expansive. It has published translations of John Berger, Noam Chomsky, Doris Lessing and other Anglophone intellectuals. It published average people, JNU students, people living in far-flung areas of the hills and even those who could barely write.

"I think Hindi's intellectual space has been progressively pauperised. If philosophical, economic, cultural and political issues are not seriously discussed in the language, then we will not be able to change our society."

PANKAJ BISHT

"Although it is difficult to grasp when I say it, Samayantar has constantly evolved," Siddharth Ramu said. For many years, Bisht did not even consider caste a significant problem but now he sees it as the nucleus of Indian society. He has resisted the societal pressures and observed them as needed.

Thakur Prasad Choubey, Samayantar's designer for fifteen years, told me the magazine takes no financial contributions. "We have even stopped taking advertisements from any government. We felt if we take money from the government, then it is immoral to write against it." Since its inception, the magazine has never recovered the cost of its production. "Whatever pension I get from my former job, I pour every paisa of it into the magazine," Bisht told me. He receives regular calls from a 92-year-old subscriber who always wants to check when the latest issue is out.
